No Room for Secret Intelligence?

2014 Annual Conference of the International Intelligence History Association (IIHA)
in Cooperation with the
Akademie für Politische Bildung Tutzing

May 2-4, 2014

INVITATION

Intelligence services and their activities present unique challenges for democracies all over the world: on the one hand, these services serve a key role in national security and foreign policy and provide decision-makers with crucial information and assessments, while on the other hand, clandestine intelligence means and methods as well as the wide investigative and intrusive powers vested in intelligence services require effective democratic oversight and control mechanisms. The inherent conflict between intelligence secrecy and government transparency highlights the importance of intelligence accountability, parliamentary oversight and legal compliance. Recent revelations over the global collection activities of the NSA, as well as controversies over the roles of intelligence in countering terrorism, increase the need for informed research and debate over intelligence and democracy.
